【解答例1】

Food loss is a major problem; therefore, I would like to suggest two measures to solve it.

The first measure is that we should educate ourselves about the proper amount of food we should eat. For example, we can use school lunches to teach students how not to waste food. We can encourage students to take smaller amounts, and allow them to go back for another helping if they are still hungry. This way, they can learn how to control their eating habits.

The second measure is that we should change the way expiration dates are set in Japan. Currently, lots of food that is still edible is thrown away because it is past the expiration date. We need to look at the food, not the date so that we will not waste any food.

By taking the measures mentioned above, we can start to solve the problem of food loss.

Food loss in Japan is a serious problem, especially when we consider that there are families that live in poverty and sometimes cannot afford to buy food. I would recommend two main measures against the problem of food loss in Japan and around the world.

First, convenience stores and restaurants that have excess food should donate it to “Kodomo shokudo”, cafeterias providing free meals for poor children. If a business donates food, then the volunteers will spend less money and have more time for the children, instead of preparing meals.

Another solution to preventing food loss could be to inform the public, both young and old, of the amount of food waste and the number of people who are starving. The government should start campaigns or use TV personalities to get the message out.

By donating the extra food and educating people about poverty, food loss will be reduced globally.
